The Chemistry of Death

So I was as unprepared as anyone when he announced he was holding a public meeting in the village hall. <...>

As I approached the village hall, I saw I’d been right.

The hall was a low, utilitarian building set back from the village square. When I’d driven past that morning on my way to the lab I’d seen Scarsdale outside, imperiously directing Tom Mason in its garden. Now the scent of freshly cut grass sweetened the air, and the yew hedges had been neatly trimmed. Old George and his grandson had been kept busy. Even the already immaculate green in the village square had been mown again, so that the area under the sweeping old horse chestnut and around the Martyr’s Stone looked almost park-like in its neatness.
